

ABSTRACT

A wireless communication device includes a transceiver to communicate in a push-to-talk mode, and a speech processor having a voice recognition engine. The speech processor detects and processes speech signals input by a user and recognizes predetermined voice commands uttered by the user. The transceiver may be controlled to transmit the speech signals in the push-to-talk mode responsive to the detection of the predetermined voice commands.